Q76947

Cited Literature 2 describes how, in a portable telephone set having a telephone directory function, when the telephone set receives data upon an incoming call, the telephone set retrieves specific information such as the telephone number and email address corresponding to this data by retrieving information obtained from an external device stored temporarily in memory (corresponding to the "history database" of the present application), or from a database in the telephone set (corresponding to the "database" of the present application) if the specific information corresponding to the aforementioned data is not in this memory. Furthermore, if said specific information has not been registered in these databases, it is retrieved from a database in an external device such as a personal computer connected to the telephone set by wireless or wired means, and specific information corresponding to said data is displayed on the display unit of the telephone set. (see especially (CLAIM 2)–(CLAIM 3), paragraphs (0014), (0017), (0023)–(0025), (0028), and (0030), and Figures 1–2 and 7).

To retrieve the specific information, whether the memory which stores information obtained from an external device is searched first, or if, like in the present application, the database in which the specific information is registered is searched first, is a feature which could be selected and employed as appropriate by a person skilled in the art.

Furthermore, a portable telephone set using Internet technology when performing communication with an external device was well-known art prior to the filing of the present application. (See for instance paragraph (0053) and Figure 6 of Cited Literature 1.)

Thus, the inventions according to Claim 1 through 14 of the present application could have been easily accomplished by a person skilled in the art by employing the art of Cited Literature 2 and the art of Cited Literature 1.
